- iv. From Back Story Preaching website July 7 2020
Steve Doughty described people whom he thought of as “the holy resilient.” He said,
When subjected to the fiercest pressures of change, the holy resilient do not just endure or bounce back. They become more: more compassionate, deeper, simpler in their desires, and more focused in how they use their time. Resilience for them is not a matter of getting back to normal, nor is it about adjusting as well as they can. It is about transformation. It is about moving beyond where they were at the start of the change. It is about becoming new persons. This is so whether the change broke upon them through a diagnosis, pink slip, an unexpected phone call, or a technological innovation that wiped out cherished patterns of working with others.*
We, too, are in the process of adjusting as well as we can.

We’re adjusting to:

- (1) the pandemic with all its inconveniences, economic impact, and mounting grief
- (2) a new fervency for racial justice and its mounting grief
- (3) questions about returning to church with or without continued online worship
- (4) an election on the near horizon that will stoke anxiety across the country [USA].

Our resilience as church leaders will be needed probably more than at any time in our ministries and for months to come — especially when the immediate urgency of the above wanes but the needs and questions remain just as important as they ever were.

We can choose to meet these challenges with granite-like immovable resistance against the rushing waters, unwilling to accept what is or what will be, exhausting ourselves and refusing to let Spirit build a new thing with us.

Or, we can meet the challenges with the resilience of a deeply-rooted reed that bends as the waters push against and swirl around it, a resilience that is strong and supple enough that even though it is bruised it does not break (Is. 42.3)....
